Dear Ms. Brown:

I have always had a fascination with cars. My dad has worked for Ford Motor Company for 25 years, and we have ongoing discussions about the newest innovations in the auto industry. We often spend Saturday afternoons working on the engines of one of the junker cars we buy just for the pleasure of seeing if we can make it run. I pretty much know my way around an engine.

Even with as much knowledge as I already have about cars, I can safely say that I still have much to learn. One area that intrigues me is gas mileage. Why is it that some cars of approximately the same weight and style have significant differences in gas mileage? Obviously, the carburetor plays a major role, but my guess is that the distance one travels on a tank of gas is more dependent upon the fuel a person puts in his car. Sellers of gasoline use various additives, and this has a direct effect on the efficiency of the car. Therefore, the working thesis for my research paper is going to be as follows:

Amoco Corporation offers the most efficient gasoline to its consumers because of their superior fuel and additive combination.

For my physical project I am going to prepare a car for a local demolition derby. I will far surpass the 10 hour minimum requirement on this undertaking which will cost approximately $200.00. My dad said that he would finance one half of the cost if I would put up the other half. This portion of the project will be a stretch for me because although I have witnessed cars being readied for a derby, I have never done it myself. A local mechanic, Mario Andretti, will be my mentor for this portion of the project.

I completely understand the effects of plagiarism and in no way will do so. I also understand that any plagiarism will result in a failing grade; therefore, I will make it easy on myself and stay away from any form of plagiarism by correctly citing any and all sources.

Sincerely,
